SO WHAT?

Demystifying Psychoeducational
Assessment Reports

While a psychological assessment is a critical component of diagnosis, far too often, the jargon and statistics that fill the pages of the resulting report appear to have little or no relevance to those who live with or teach children with learning disabilities. Without an understand of how the results can be translated into useful suggestions for ways to help parents, teachers, and the individuals themselves, valuable information may be lost, and the potential benefits bypassed.

This presentation will provide some clarification of what assessments actually assess and why. It is designed not only for those who must read, interpret and apply the findings, but also for professionals who write these reports, in an effort not only to facilitate communication, but more importantly to help understand the essence of what a learning
